This invention relates to the treatment of contaminated groundwater by removing the contaminants therein and recovering the treated water for subsequent use. More particularly, the invention relates to the recovery of such treated water by the evaporation of a portion thereof. 2. Description of the Prior Art Where the ground or a portion of the surface above the ground is unfit for human habitation or agricultural use, contaminated water can pollute the ground and surface waters thereunder to the point where the quality of the water is no longer suitable for human use or agricultural irrigation. This problem is particularly acute in arid and semi-arid regions of the world where surface water is scarce and there are a great many wells in close proximity to the ground surface. Even in temperate regions, wells can be subject to contamination from industrial or other sources of pollution such as landfills or smelters. There have been developed various procedures for treating contaminated groundwater to remove the contaminants. The most common method for treating contaminated groundwater to remove the contaminants consists of: (1) injecting an air sparging air-dissolving agent, such as superheated steam into the ground below the contaminated zone through one or more injection wells to form a sparging zone, (2) withdrawing contaminated water from the sparging zone and treating the water in a well treatment facility, and (3) injecting the treated water back into the treated water zone. A well treatment facility may include an air stripping well, sometimes referred to as an air vent, and one or more wells arranged in a graduated unit receiving zone for withdrawing contaminated water. The air stripping well may receive air for in-well stripping, and typically incorporates a plurality of air-receiving openings arranged in a manner to cause a fine flow of air to enter the well in all directions. Such an arrangement is intended to provide a uniform air flow to develop a fine film
